These tabby ruins are remnants of the fortified house built by Noble Jones ca. 1739-1744. During the early years of the colony it served as a strategic outpost against Spanish invasion on the southern approach to Savannah. At the same time, it housed the Jones family at Wormsloe, before being abandoned in the 1820's.

The Gardens contain thousands of azaleas and hundreds of camelias besides a wide collection of native shrubs, evergreens, and trees. In addition to the Gardens there are slave cabins used eighty years ago and the old plantation slave burial ground. On the place there is also a large Confederate battery. These Gardens have been in the same family since the Royal Grant from King George II in 1733 to Noble Jones, and are now owned by the 7th generation.

Lowell Thomas told last night (Wedn.) that storm warnings were out from Hatteras to Del. We had just gone thro' it + laughed at their just getting that news. I might be said a tanker brook in two - we are not surprised - only glad they were all saved - that our boat held together. Caught all the old good sailors & you should have heard all the various exposures for why they went down. One child said she had too much milk! We were fully trying to see if she knew it was sea.
The afternoon was spent in town here seeing the sights - palms - live oaks, Camellias in bloom every where. Nails going
